REFLECTION, Second Sunday after the Nativity (A)

Everything with a beginning also has an end. This is the very lot of contingent realities. Nothing finite exists always but, in its finitude, it has its moment of coming to being as well as moment of ceasing to be. The contingency of finite realities announces the fact that, for all finite realities, time is a borrowed commodity and so should be well utilized, knowing that it is running out all the time and diminishing in its availability.

One thing is certain as we start another year, namely, that God is with us. We enjoy by his grace the light of Christ and the enlightenment and empowerment it brings. He who is in Christ is a new creation. If we live and move in him, we walk in the light of his righteousness and light dispels the darkness of our milieu. Christ never forces himself upon us but waits at the door of our heart and asks to be let in, if we want to.

Of course, he is eager to make his home in us but he will not force his way through. Yet when he comes in, he does not delay in asserting his influence. When he comes in, we know that darkness takes flight while our lives become illumined by his light. The basic challenge we have to face, therefore, is opening our lives to his presence more and more and allowing the light of Christ to dispel the darkness of our lives.

There is no limit to which we can open up to the light of Christ for the truth is, there will always be something in us that needs to be overcome. As we allow the light of Christ to permeate our lives, we are gradually drawn into him and begin to reflect him in our manners and ways. The light of Christ and the need to allow it to dominate our lives must then become an important factor in terms of how we review each day, each month and indeed, each year. It is one point of reference in terms of which we can assess the outgone year and preview the current year.

The basic question is how far we have allowed the light of Christ to come into our domain? This question in turn is crucial for the focusing of the New Year. The manner in which we answer the question will determine what adjustment needs to be made in the Year and how to make such adjustment. A life lived in Christ is a life that is richly blessed. A life lived in Christ is one in which light triumphs over darkness. As we review the outgone year and pre-view the current year there is a dialectic of darkness and light as it concerns our whole effort to make the best of the New Year, such as to overcome the liabilities of the past year and consolidate the gains of the past year as well. One who is intent in making the best of life cannot afford to neglect the demand of review and preview at it pertains to our reception of the outgone year and the start of the New Year. May the Lord help us, Amen.
